6 ways for parents to set a great example for their sports playing child:

1. Don't only support your child – Try to support the entire group or team. Instead of only focusing on your own child, try cheering and complimenting the entire team. When you do this, you not only create a positive and healthy environment for your child but for all.
2. Practice good karma- what goes around comes around. Unless you have something positive to say, don't talk negatively about other players, parents, or coaches in front of others.
3. Don't put your child on a pedestal – Even if they are the star of the team, kids need to support one another and play as a team. Parents need to do the same. Encourage all, no matter what level they may be.
4. Applaud the other team too – Congratulate any good play. If kids see the adults applauding good plays made by the other team or child, they will be getting a very important message : that the game isn't such a life-or death thing. It's about FUN and effort remember?
5. Show gratitude – Thank everyone who contributed, especially the officials and coaches. Expressions of gratitude go a long way to motivating officials and coaches to continue doing the job they are doing.
6. Reward effort, not the result. The fact your child is out there and doing it, should make you proud enough.
